

Farm Life a Century Ago: A Paper Read Upon Several Occasions (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Farm Life a Century Ago: A Paper Read Upon Several Occasions In the old days, when methods of work about the house and arm were prized for their hoary antiquity rather than, as now, for their novelty, and all farmers did as their ancestors had done, there was hardly a man in the New England towns who was not engaged in the pleasant occupation of farming. The storekeeper and the miller plowed, harrowed, and cultivated in the intervals of their other work, and the minister himself hung up his gown after the last service on Sunday, and, like the rest of the community, worked his land on Monday morning. A century ago each town owned a farm, the use of which was allowed the minister, rent free, as a part of his salary.
